Fiat G.55 Centauro

Fiat G.55 Centauro

As early as 1939, Italian aircraft factories began designing monoplane fighters using inline as opposed to radial engines. Fiat experimented with the G.50 powered by an Italian built Daimler-Benz 601, then used a newly designed G.55 powered by a licence built 605 engine. The prototype flew in April 1942. It had good performance and flight characteristics at all altitudes. The original series were armed with a 20mm MG 151/20 cannon fitted in the forward fuselage and firing between the engine cylinder heads, and through the propeller arc. It also had 4 x 12.7mm Breda machine-guns; 2 in the upper cowl, and 2 in the lower cowl, all firing through the propeller arc. Problems servicing the lower guns meant replacing them with a 20mm MG 151/20 cannon in each wing. Later aircraft armament varied with both cannon plus machine-guns. A hard-point on each wing could carry a bomb up to 160kg (350 lb) or a 100 litre (26 u.s gal) drop-tank.

A problem with a left-hand yaw tendency under take-off power was partially resolved with a slightly off-set vertical stabiliser.

The Fiat G.55 proved to be an excellent interceptor and no easy target for the Spitfire, Mustang, Thunderbolt, and Lightnings over Northern Italy in 1944. Its good performance and handling at high altitude also made it the best option to use against allied bombers.

The G.55 was used by Aeronautica Nazionale Repubblicana (ANR) and Regia Aeronautica. In its short service life, it flew mainly under Repubblica Sociale Italiana insignia. Less than 300 were produced.
